A few bright summer years have flown, Since fi at those eyes beheld the day : A few bright summer years have strown. Their ascertest incense o'er thy way. Life is to thee a vernal morn,

Sure Nature smiled upon thy birth, And hously watched around ity bed; And cull'd the farrest gifts of earth, To scatter o'et thine infant head. For who can guae upon that brow, So soft and sursorth, so pure and iar, Or watch thy height gues kundling g'ow, And doubt that genus sparkles there?

Eve ween thee 'midst the gla'ring throng, Where beauty shed its dazzing i ght, Moving as if thou did the ledong. To some pure planet will more bright. 'I a not that wealth around thee throws. The circle of its halo bright; Thou'rt like the spark ling gent that glown Rich in its own unborrowed light. Had'st thou been born a cottage maid,
Far from the haunts of busy men,
Tending thy flocks beneath the shade
Of some sequestered, lonely glen—
Even then, the stranger, as he poss'd,
Had felt the involuntary charm;
And turning off, had backward enst
A longering look upon thy form.

which Buffalse once roved, and from whence, in all human probability, the name of Buffalse Creek. The pioneers of our country must have been according to the state of the very beautiful influences, and should ever be pastoral poets as names were bestowed on places which would defy all fancy and combination, ever to weave into the poet inner.

Buffalse creck, however, withits chilling prosaic name, water sites of the very beautiful influences, and, and yet grand, noble and swelling. Many of the farm houses, whose inmates have never made the discovery, stand aims scenery, with landscapes which seem to float as moving pictures, and which a Thompson, at Kleist, or a Delisle, might go far to visit and be rewarded. The first settlers had, it may be confessed, something to them far more serious to seek than splendid prospects, and many of them sat down where, as the forest fell, the lengthened view opened, merely because the stat down where no fine farms could be opened without one or more being the centre of an exhanting landscape.

All who made their home in the woods of Buffalse, between fifty and sixty years past, were not mere hunters, or tillers of the soil, rough, rude and yet honest, hospitable and kind. Two there were of higher grade; it wo men upon whose fertile minds the seeds of lore had fallen, taken root and flourished. In learning slone, these two men were alike; in all else they were as contrasted. Richard Ryland, had a heart as warm as ever heat in the breast of any one of his countrymen; but early disappointment gave a bitter, sad, irractible, and should be contrasted. Richard Ryland, had sheart as warm as ever beat in the breast of any one of his countrymen; but early disappointment gave a bitter, sad, irractible, and sometimes a fierce tone to his powerful mind of the last still tender, whilst another is indicted.
